He was there it seemed by his father's author-ter. But here must be some treachery, for how would their father have ordered this cruel act it was at Rotterdam. She ended by entreat-ing Glies to bear her company to the foot of the suntact tower, to say a word of comfort to poo! Gerard, and let him know their father was abmt, and would be sure to release him on hi.

"Dear Giles, I would go alone, but I an area of the spirits that men say do haunt the lower; but with you I shall not be afeard."
"Nor I with you," said Giles. "I don't be love there are any spirits in Tergou. I never now one. This last was the likest one ever saw, and t was only you, Kate, after all."
It less than half an hour, Giles and Katashed the house door cautiously and issues both. She made him carry a lantern, though the night was bright.

the night was bright.

'The lantern gives me more courage against the evil spirits," said she.

The first day of imprisonment is very trying, especially if to the horror of capitity is added the horror of utter solitude. I observe and earst day of imprisonment is very tryar, especially if to the horror of captivity is added the horror of utter solitude. I observe that in our own day a great many persons commit suicide during the first twenty-four sours of the solitary cell. This is doubtless

As the sun declined, Gerard's heart, too, sank and sank; with the waning light, even the subers of hope went out. He was faint, too, with hunger; for he was afraid to at the food Ghysbrecht had brought im; and hunger alone cows men.— He sat upon the chest, his arms and his head drooping before him, a picture of depondency. Suddenly something struck the wall beyond him very sharply, and then rattled as the floor at his feet. It was an arrow; he was the white feather. A chill ran through im—they meant then to assassinate him from he outside. He crouched. No more missiles num. He crawled on all fours, and took up he arrow; there was no head to it. He utter de cry of hope; had a friendly hand shot it.
He took it up, and felt it all over; he funnic a structure was of grand use to him. His inder-love enabled him to strike a light; it howed him two things that made his heart round with delight, none the less thrilling by being somewhat varue. Attached to the frew was a skein of silk, and on the arrow iteff were words written.
How his eye devoured them, his heart pantng the while!

Gerard seized the oak chest, and with almost Gerard seized the oak chest, and with almost sperhuman energy dragged it to the window: a moment ago he could not have moved it. Standing on the chest and looking down he saw gures at the tower foot. They were so indistinct they looked like one huge form: He waved is bonnet to them with trembling hand: then se undid the silk rapidly but carefully, and eads one end fast to his knife, and lowered it ill it ceased to draw. Then he counted a hunded. Then pulled the silk carefully up: it ame up a little heavier. At last he came to a large knot, and by that knot a tout whipcord was attached to the silk. What might this mean? While he was puzzling himself Margaret's voice came up to him, low but clear. "Draw up, Gerard, all you see liberty in your hand." At the word levard drew the whipcord line, and drew and low till he came to another knot, and found a and of some thickness take the place of the shipcord. He had no sooner begun to draw has shipord. He had no somer begun to draw shipord. He had no somer begun to draw seight to deal with. Then the truth suddenly hashed on him, and he went to work, and pull-at and pulled till the perspiration rolled down him: the weight got beavier and heavier, and im: the weight got beavier and heavier, and and at last he was well-nigh exhausted; lookag down he saw in the moonlight a sight that brived him: it was as it were a great snake coming up to him out of the deep shadow cast by the tower. He gave a shout of joy, and a score more wild pulls, and lo! a stout new rope touched his hand: he sauled and hauled, and dragged the end and hauled, and dragged the end ato his power, and instantly passed it hrough both handles of the chest in succession, and knotted it firmly; then sat for a moment to coover his breath and collect his courage. The irst thing was to make sure that the chest was cund, and capable of resisting his weight coised in mid-air. He jumped with all his force apon it. At the third jump the whole side varst open, and out scuttled the contents, a host of parchments.

After the first start and misgiving this gave sim, Gerard comprehended that the chest had set burst but opened: he had doubtless jumped spen the secret spring. Still it shook in some tagree his confidence in the chest's powers of unstance; so he gave it an ally: he took the ron bar and fastened it with the small rope was the large wore, and seroes the window. segree his confidence in the chest's powers of windlance; so he gave it an ally; he took the ron bar and fastened it with the small rope cross the large rope, and across the window. He now mounted the chest, and from the chest at his foot through the window, and sat half in and half out, with one hand on that part of the ope which was inside. It was a nervous moment; sat the free air breathed on his face and gave sim the courage to risk what we must all loss one day—for liberty. Many dangers awaited sim, but the greatest was the first getting on a the rope outside. Gerard reflected. Finally is put himself in the attitude of a swimmer, sis body to the waist being in the prison, his egn outside. Then holding the inside rope with both hands, he felt with his feet for the setside rope, and when he had got it he worked the both hands, he felt with his feet for the setside rope, and when he had got it he worked the both hands, he felt with his feet for the setside rope, and when he had got it had on the dil and gradually wriggled out. Then he seized the iron bar and for one fearful moment hung satisfies from it by his right hand, while his left sand seized the rope down at his knees. It was so tight against the wall for his fingers to get wind it higher up. The next moment he left has bar and swiftly seized the rope with the ight hand too; but in this unnecure his body secressarily descended about a yard, and a stiffied cry came up from below. Gerard hang in mid-air. He clenched his teeth and nipped the rope tight with his feet and gripped it with his hands, and went down slowly down. He looked up and he leaked down. The moon shone upon his prison window; jit seemed very near. The intering figures below seemed an awful distance. It made him dizzy to look down; so he liked his eyes steadily on the wall close to him, and went slowly down, down, down.

He passed a rusty slimy streak on the wall, it was some ten feet long. The rope made his hands very hot. He stole another look up.

The rope made his hands sore.
